(57) Abstract :

Students used to go to some guidance counsellor or consult someone who seems to be trustworthy. But humans are always preoccupied and limited in the knowledge. We all know minds of students in younger age is constantly changing, lots of stuff goes in there. One second, they are interested in being doctor and the next second, they would want to be an engineer. So, it's hard to process and describe all of it to one counsellor concisely within one hour in a week. Having too many options also makes you misguided sometimes. The students these days face similar problem regarding their career paths and setting up their goals. The life of students is tough, there's always some constant pressure from many dimensions like peer, family, teachers, etc. And the individuals start to loose clarity in their interests, arenas and eventually this leads to misguided goals. We can't imagine the exposure of information a student gets these days, and having that much information works as a distraction most of the times.
